RELEVANT PROJECT

The Impact of Real Effective Exchange Rate on Economic Growth

January 2020 - April 2020

- Cooperated with group members to collect data for main variables which reached a time span for 40 years from 1979 to 2018 for 93 countries
- Used the natural logarithm of all variables to run a fixed effect panel regression on Eviews
- Defined four different classifications for countries and separated regressions in each category to compare different results
- Based on the results, there is no significant relationship between real effective exchange rate and GDP in countries with pegged currencies and fuel exporting countries. In both developed and developing countries, the relationship is significant and the magnitude of the positive relationship is much more stronger during the great recession
